TO: Hawaiian Airlines Employees

FROM: John W. Adams
Chairman of the Board

The most persistent question asked of me since the Hawaiian-Aloha merger announcement has been, given all of the achievements of our airline over the past several years, why is this transaction necessary. There has been a lot of speculation in this regard in the newspapers, among politicians, and elsewhere. I would like to give my own perspective on the decision to proceed with this transaction.

This past summer I reflected on what we had accomplished at Hawaiian Airlines, and analyzed our likely prospects going forward. There were many positive things achieved. The financial position of the Company was considerably stronger than it had been in a long time. We had just completed, or were about to complete, new pay raises and benefit improvements, long postponed. The airline was in the middle of successfully re-equipping our interisland operations and commencing a program to do the same with our transpac flights. Our financial and marketing technology had been modernized. And so forth. Most importantly, I perceived in management and rank-and-file alike a commitment to quality. Our special Hawaiian culture was catching the attention of more and more of the traveling public.

And yet, as I thought about our future, it was clear that something was holding us back. In short, I concluded, we have not had a profitable interisland operation for a long time, and unless we did something about it we could not achieve consistent economic stability. In spite of our investment of over $300 million in our new, efficient 717 fleet, the best we could look forward to was a more or less break even interisland operation. With this lack of profit from an operation accounting for about 35% of our passenger revenue, Hawaiian Airlines would have no chance of getting to a higher level necessary to provide an adequate future for both shareholders and employees. Then the events of September 11th happened and matters got worse.

As you may know, there have been merger discussions with Aloha previously, but nothing had materialized. But after September 11th the ownership and management of both airlines realized their very future, and most certainly the future of airline operations within Hawaii, was in jeopardy. A merger became not only compelling but absolutely necessary.

There has been considerable talk about this being, or not being, a "merger of equals." Rumors fly around regarding the financial condition of Aloha. These issues are irrelevant. The fact of the matter is these two independent and proud airlines need to pursue this transaction to assure safe, reliable transportation for our State of Hawaii, continued improvements on employee compensation, and sufficient return on shareholders' investment. For all the right reasons, the merger offers the best future for our company.

The employees of Hawaiian Airlines have a lot to feel proud about. I understand the reasons many of you wish the merger didn't have to happen. In fact, I really enjoy being Chairman of this company and am reluctant to step down. But, in my view, by taking this action, we are best providing for the future of our company and employees. We will open a big, new door of opportunity to a larger, stronger airline that will fly to new places, offer more jobs and be an even more exciting place to work - the kind of airline we all want Hawaiian to become, but which would not be possible were it not for this merger.

It's time to seize this opportunity, to forge ahead. Your management and I ask for your continued support and cooperation to make our new airline a reality. The spirit of our wonderful Hawaiian culture will continue to live.
